Q1 Answer:

Answer the following questions:

Do you ever feel as though you spend all your time in meetings?

i) What is the purpose of a meeting according to the writer?

The drive of a meeting extends beyond its supposed goals of problem-solving and decision making. While those aspects are often touted as the main objectives, the writer suggests the meetings serve mainly as a opportunity for role-playing and social interaction, Meetings allow participants to engage in various roles, such as the chairman, constant talker, or counter-dependents, which may not necessarily contribute directly to decision-making but fulfill spiritual and social needs. Meetings offer a platform for individual to assert their status, avoid work, or justify their performance. Overall, the writer portrays meetings as a necessary but potentially unproductive aspect of organizational life, serving as a means of managing interpersonal dynamics and maintaining the status quo.

ii) The “can’t do” type wants to maintain a status grow. Elaborate.

The “can’t do” types mentioned in the passage are individuals who resist change and want to maintain the existing state of affairs or status quo. They often rely on their historical experience within the organization, using past failures as a justification to block proposed changes. Their resistance is based on a reluctance to embrace new ideas or approaches.

iii) What does devoted to side-issues” mean in this context?

iv) What is the position in the organization of those who steal others’ ideas? How do they do it?

v) What does the “counter-dependents “mean?

vi) Complete the following table:

	People	Role at Meetings
1	Chairman	Keep the meeting running on time & to the point
2	Constant talker	Usually dominates discussions with excessive Talking
3	Can’t Do type	Wants to maintain the status quo, resists change
4	Yes, but	Sound positive but resist change
5	Role-Players/Attendees	Engage in various roles, games , or discussions
6	Counter-Dependents	Disagree with everything, resist authority

Chairman: The most formal role is that of chairman. He (and it is usually a he) sets the agendas, and a good Chairman will keep the meeting running on time and to the point.

Constant talker: the other, informal, role-players are often able to gain the upper hand. Chief is the “constant talker”, who just loves to hear his or her own voice.

Can't Do type: Then there are the “can't do” types who want to maintain the status quo. Since they have often been in the organization for a long time, they frequently quote historical experience as a ploy to block change:

Yes, but: A more subtle version of the “can't do” type, the “yes, but...”, has emerged recently. They have learnt about the need to sound positive, but they still can't bear to have things change.

Role-Players/Attendees: The most formal role is that of chairman. He (and it is usually a he) sets the agendas, and a good chairman will keep the meeting running on time and to the point.

Counter-Dependents:

A: Sure, it's John Smith, and my name is 93772223-344.
B: thank you, John. I'll leave a message on his desk for you. Is there anything else?
A: No, that's it. Thanks for your help. Goodbye.
B: You're welcome. Goodbye.

Q3 Answer : Write short notes on any four of the following:.

i) Significance of Minutes of the meeting.

1. Accountability: Minutes provide a record of the decisions made and actions assigned during a meeting, making it easier for everyone to know who is responsible for what.
2. Transparency: Circulating minutes promptly helps ensure that all participants, including those who may not have been able to attend the meeting, have access to the same information.
3. Memory Aid: Even the most attentive attendees can forget details from a meeting, especially if there's a long gap between meetings. An accurate record helps refresh everyone's memory and ensures nothing gets overlooked.

4. Legal and Regulatory Compliance: For certain organizations and industries, accurate and complete meeting minutes may be required for legal or regulatory compliance purposes.
5. Conflict Resolution: In case of disagreements or misunderstandings about what was discussed or decided in a meeting, having an accurate record of the meeting can be invaluable in resolving the issue.

ii) Interpersonal Skill of a Manager in an Organization.

v) Do's and Don'ts during Meetings.

- Use the meeting agenda as the template.
Using the agenda as a template is a great way to structure your meeting minutes. Meeting notes should be made for each agenda item. Having an effective agenda will ensure consistency across all meeting minutes.
 - Include the date, time and venue of the meeting.
First thing is getting the basics in order. You should record the date, time, and venue of the meeting.
 - Register of all the attendees.
Record all of the meeting attendees, including the minutes taker. Also remember to record the participants who were unable to attend.
 - Record any decisions, votes, or approvals.
Be sure to keep a record of the outcomes of any decisions, votes, and approvals for future reference. That way, if there are any disagreements in the future about a decision, you can easily pinpoint when and why the decision was made.
1. Track action items including due date.
The actions from the meeting should be tracked with the due dates. It is also worth recording any actions that were carried over from the previous meeting.
 2. Get the draft meeting minutes checked by the chair.
Once the draft meeting minutes are written up, share them with the chair before publishing. There may be things not included that they want included in the final version.

3. Store the meeting minutes digitally.

Archiving meeting minutes electronically has multiple benefits. Firstly, it takes up less space than physical copies. Secondly, electronic archiving is easier to manage. The ability to search through hundreds of past meeting minutes can save you significant labour hours and the cost that goes with it. Furthermore, storing documents on the cloud is safer than physical copies.

4. Keep the meeting minutes concise.

The point of keeping meeting minutes is the ability to look back and understand the main discussion points and outcomes of the meeting. When taking meeting minutes be concise. Summarise the main points of the meeting as well as any outcomes to decisions.

5. Record amendments to previous meeting minutes.

Include any amendments and corrections made to the previous meeting minutes.

Don'ts

1. Don't share the meeting minutes via email or paper.

Sharing your meeting minutes via email or on loose paper is a security risk – once shared you have no control over who this information is forwarded onto. We advise you to store, and share meeting minutes on a secure board portal platform.

2. Don't handwrite the meeting minutes.

Firstly, if you're handwriting your meeting minutes that means your using paper. Paper copies of minutes can be lost (and found by the wrong person) or destroyed. That's why meeting minutes should be kept digitally. Furthermore, handwritten meeting minutes may not be readable by all necessary parties due to poor handwriting.

3. Don't include direct quotes or debates.

Meeting minutes should be concise. Just include the facts, summarise the main points and the outcomes of any decisions.

4. Don't wait long before writing.

You should write your meeting minutes straight away, while the meeting is still fresh in your mind. If you wait too long, you may forget some key information from the meeting. Best practice is to take meeting notes during the meeting, and then to write up the draft minutes on the same day, before sharing with the chair.

5. Don't switch tenses throughout.

Consistency is important. Stick to one tense when writing your meeting minutes. We advise you to use past tense, however you can choose to use present tense if you prefer.
Just stay consistent!

6. Don't use personal judgements.

Try to stay objective when writing your meeting minutes. This means no personal opinions or comments about the meeting. You should keep a neutral tone throughout the meeting minutes.

iii) Importance of Visuals in Presentations.

vi) Do's and Don'ts on Social Media.

- Post the relevant content keeping in mind, your audience: The number one reason why most users find trouble in social media is because they fail to keep their audience in mind. By considering your audience, you should be able to identify what's worth sharing or posting and what's not.
- Don't need to share everything in social media: You don't have to post everything about your personal life and your day-to-day activities.
- Build a reputable image: It's a good practice to examine your profile and identify what image you are portraying through your posts and shares.
- Don't be overly promotional: Try not to message all your customers asking them to buy your products and avoid sharing constant advertisements on your page. Make your social profiles a blend of promotional and valuable content.
- Avoid over-automation: While scheduling your posts in advance and automating analytics is helpful, don't automate everything. Some things still need a human touch.
- Handle your hashtags carefully: Avoid using too many hashtags at once. Even on Instagram, where you can use 30 hashtags in a single caption, it's important not to overdo it.
- Don't bad-mouth your competition: Don't be petty. Saying negative things about your competitors online will harm your reputation more than it hurts theirs.
- Be authentic and genuine: Don't try to be something you're not. Remember that your customers can learn whatever they need to know about your brand online today and things like authenticity can definitely go a long way.
- Different Account for Business/personal use: Business and pleasure do not mix in this medium.
- Don't force to be Friends: Don't approach strangers and ask them to be friends with you.
- Take care of grammar and semantic aspects: Compose your posts, updates or tweets in a word processing document so you can check grammar and spelling before you send them.
- Don't show hatred / post hatred message: Social media should be a platform to initiate meaningful discussion and promote better communication. It's not the place to vent out your anger on something or someone. Don't add to its toxicity by trolling and spreading negativity.
- Respect the opinions of others: Accept the fact that not everyone has the same opinion as you do. However reasonable you believe your arguments to be, you won't be able to convince everyone. Keep this in mind when you comment, post, or share anything on social media.

- Don't spread/ share fake news: While there is a lot of content online, it is your moral and social responsibility not to mislead others by spreading fake news. Always check your sources and be critical with what you read. Don't be easily fooled with unreliable information.
- Say NO to cyber-bullying: Every social media user should be responsible and mature enough to oppose and not be part of cyber-bullying. Always be sensitive when interacting with others in social media. Treat them as you would like to be treated.
- Copyright Issues: Give due credit to your sources. Social media is a wonderful place to share your work but be sure to ask permission and cite your sources when you use material or content from others. Always give credit wherever it's due. Take care of the copyright and plagiarism issues.
- Value Privacy: Part of building a good reputation online is to keep anything personal private. Keeping your personal information safe will help protect you from online fraud and identity theft. Make use of the privacy settings of the social media channels you use. These settings are now more versatile and help keep your content secure.

Q1:

Read the following passage and answer the questions given below:

MEETINGS

Do you ever feel as though you spend all your time in meetings?

Henry Mintzberg, in his book The Nature of Managerial Work, found that in large organizations managers spent 22 per cent of their time at their desk, 6 per cent on the telephone, 3 per cent on other activities, but a whopping 69 per cent in meetings. There is a widely held but mistaken belief that meetings are for “solving problems” and “making decisions”. For a start, the number of people attending a meeting tends to be inversely proportional to their collective ability to reach conclusions and make decisions. And these are the least important elements.

Instead hours are devoted to side issues, playing elaborate games with one another. It seems, therefore, that meetings serve some purpose other than just making decisions. All meetings have one thing in common: role-playing. The most formal role is that of chairman. He (and it is usually a he) sets the agendas, and a good chairman will keep the meeting running on time and to the point. Sadly, the other, informal, role-players are often able to gain the upper hand. Chief is the “constant talker”, who just loves to hear his or her own voice.

Then there are the “can’t do” types who want to maintain the status quo. Since they have often been in the organisation for a long time, they frequently quote historical experience as a ploy to block change: “It won’t work, we tried that in 1984 and it was a disaster”. A more subtle version of the “can’t do” type, the “yes, but...”, has emerged recently. They have learnt about the need to sound positive, but they still can’t bear to have things change.

Another whole-sub-set of characters are people who love meetings and want them to continue until 5.30 p.m or beyond. Irrelevant issues are their speciality. They need to call or attend meetings, either to avoid work, or to justify their lack of performance, or simply because they do not have enough to do.

Then there are the “counter-dependents”, those who usually disagree with everything that is said, particularly if it comes from the chairman or through consensus from the group. These people need to fight authority in whatever form.

Meetings can also provide attenders with a sense of identification of their status and power.

A popular game is pinching someone else’s suggestions. This is where someone, usually junior or female, makes an interesting suggestion early in the meeting, which is not picked up. Much later, the game is played, usually by some more senior figure that propounds the idea as his own. The suggestion is of course identified with the player rather the initiator.

Because so many meeting ends in confusion and without a decision, another more common game is played at the end of meetings, called reaching a false consensus. Since it is important for the chairman to appear successful in problem-solving and making a decision, the group reaches a false consensus. Everyone is happy, having spent their time productively. The reality is that the decision is so ambiguous that it is never acted upon, or, if it is, there is continuing conflict, for which another meeting is necessary.

In the end, meetings provide the opportunity for social intercourse, to engage in battle in front of our bosses, to avoid unpleasant or unsatisfying work, to highlight our social status and identity. They are, in fact, a necessary though not necessarily productive psychological sideshow. Perhaps it is our civilized way of moderating, if not preventing, change.
